

Public school System : A promising Tool For Quality Education

Private schools can be simply understood as schools which are set up by individuals or a group of individuals without any support or financial aid granted by the government.

Public schools, on the other hand, have grants and resources sanctioned by the government. Their functioning may involve the participation of government.

Public Schools are one of the biggest undertakings of the Government Of India.

Public schools reach out to children where Private schools find little or negligible potential of fruitful investment.

To get into a private school is a more competitive affair than it is to secure a seat in a public school. The reason can be linked with the high fee structure, high admission standards and the focus that private schools have for the creamy layer of the children of the society.

Many also associate education at a private education as a matter of prestige. However, this is It would be highly controversial to say that Public School students do not perform as well as their private school counterparts.

This is because many from public schools have proved themselves to be at par, and many a times better than those who had access to better facilities, faculties and opportunities.

However, In most of the developing states of India, Like Bihar , Jharkhand , Public school serve as synonyms to deplorable institutions with substandard infrastructure, no existent faculty and unhygienic food .

Resources which are sanctioned to improve and to maintain these schools are channelized into pockets of the venal middlemen to satisfy their personal monetary cravings.

The faculty serves in absentia, the infrastructure is discouraging, the facilities are substandard. Along with this, various central and state implemented schemes like mid day meals run merely for the time that would help them get their money sanctioned from the state.

A strict hold on the public schools of India can be a major step towards the spread of quality education in India. Public schools have the ability to serve the brightest minds at affordable costs only if they are properly administered.
